Part I Reading Comprehension (阅读理解, 40 分, 20×2)

Directions: There are 4 passages in this part. Each passage is followed by some questions or incomplete sentences. For each of them there are 4 choices marked A, B, C and D. You should decide on the best choice and mark the corresponding letter on the Answer Sheet. (2×20)

Passage One

Since ancient times, frugality has been one of the traditional virtues among Chinese people. Following this traditional way of life, more young people in China are looking to frugal, low-cost lifestyles in order to spend less and save more.

In following a trend adopted by their counterparts in many other countries, they are beginning to realize and reject the pitfalls of consumerism, believing that simplicity can bring happiness and satisfaction, experts said.

Economic and employment pressures, as well as changing attitudes toward material life, are also resulting in more young people turning their backs on extravagance and waste in the post-pandemic era, the experts added.

Frugality is being practised in a number of ways. Some young people opt for discounts and low-priced goods, while others are replacing well-known brands with those that are cost-effective. Some are cautious when buying nonessential items, while others say they save all they can in order to make important purchases.

He Jiacheng, 22, a college student in Shenzhen, Guangdong province, said he spends about 10 yuan on each meal and no more than 100 yuan on each item of clothing.

He, who is studying economics, said his pursuit of frugality stems from the idea of "realizing maximum happiness through minimum expenditure".

The student added, "As luxury food and brand-name clothing cannot increase my happiness, why not satisfy myself by spending less for the same amount of happiness?"

Passage Two

To date, Chinese colleges have established 11 Luban Workshops in African countries, offering a wide range of professional training and help for the younger generation in these nations to build up their professional skills.

Named after Lu Ban, an ancient Chinese woodcraft master, the workshops have risen in popularity in recent years because of the drive by Beijing to promote international cooperation on vocational education.

A total of 27 Luban Workshops have been established in 25 countries, most of them in the developing world. The programs provide training in vocational skills tailored to meet the demands of host countries.

Most of the workshops are located at vocational colleges in host countries, and they are usually established through partnerships between such colleges in China and their local counterparts. The Chinese institutions share their equipment, teaching methods and materials, and provide training for teachers.

Since the first Luban Workshop outside China was set up in Thailand in 2016, the 27 workshops established to date offer more than 6,100 students and temporary training programs for some 31,500 students. The workshops have also provided training for more than 4,000 teachers from host countries.

Some African nations have already benefited from the vocational education cooperation programs. In Djibouti, the first 24 students trained by a Luban Workshop in fields such as railway operations and rail engineering technology have become interns for the Addis Ababa-Djibouti Railway.

That workshop, the first of its kind launched by China in Africa, is expected to help train talent, which is in short supply, to ensure the maintenance and operations of the railway, a flagship project built by Chinese construction companies within the framework of the Belt and Road Initiative.

Passage Three

Foreign and domestic businesses opened a total of 121 new flagship stores at major shopping centers in Shenzhen in the first half of the year as the city's consumption made a strong recovery from the COVID pandemic.

According to WMDE, an industry data provider, these new stores are all "first stores", which means they are the first opened by these businesses in Shenzhen or in South China, or even in China.

Out of the 121 new stores, 40 are first in China and 34 in Shenzhen, signifying that the city has still retained its strong appeal to both foreign and domestic businesses.

These new stores have centered on catering, clothing, fashion and lifestyle sectors. Among them, fashion and lifestyle account for 24% of first stores, followed by clothing at 18% and leisure dining at 13%.

First store and brand economies, an important index reflecting business innovation and a city's influence, now play a driving role in stimulating consumption in China. In recent years, Shenzhen has been introducing measures to boost the "first store economy".

Renowned global brands that open their flagship shops in Shenzhen will receive a reward of 1 million yuan, and if the shop is the first of its kind in China or in South China, the rewards will be 600,000 yuan and 300,000 yuan respectively, according to a plan unveiled by Shenzhen's commerce bureau on expanding consumption in 2021.

In April 2021, Shenzhen unveiled measures on building international consumption centers. Among the measures, property owners that introduced flagship shops of renowned domestic and global brands will receive rewards of 500,000 yuan for retail outlets, or 200,000 yuan for catering outlets.

The reward for a property owner or operator will be no more than 3 million yuan a year. For the product launching or shop launching activities of renowned brands in Shenzhen, the government will give subsidies at 30% of the actual cost but capped at 3 million yuan.

Passage Four

Aksu in the Xinjiang Uygur autonomous region is making efforts to optimize the use of water resources by building a world-class reservoir project, which aims to reduce droughts and floods and reduce their influence on local economic development and people's livelihoods, as well as generate power.

Located at the junction of Wensu and Wushi counties of Aksu, the Dashixia water reservoir project started construction in December 2017, and is expected to test its water-holding function in October 2025 and finish all construction around October 2026.

To better monitor the quality of construction work and collect construction data, the company channeled around 30 million yuan to build a smart monitoring system.

Seeing the project in smooth operation, the 45-year-old Xu Shumei, a senior technician from the company, feels her efforts and contributions are rewarded.

"I've worked in Xinjiang since 1999 after finishing my education in Chongqing, my hometown. And I started to work for the project around four years ago," she said.

She is responsible for quality control, laboratory management and energy saving and emission reduction for the project.

"I've never regretted serving in this industry, and it may be a once-in-a-lifetime chance to get involved in such a world-class project. But I owe a lot to my daughter and parents who need my care because of my work," she added.

Secondary schools in the Netherlands will ban mobile phones, tablets and smartwatches from the classroom in the new year to reduce distractions.

The only exceptions to the rule will be when the devices are integral to the topic being studied, or if individual students have specific needs because of factors such as disability.

Some schools have already introduced voluntary restrictions, but Education Minister Robbert Dijkgraaf said that while pieces of technology "are intertwined with our lives, they do not belong in the classroom".

"Students need to be able to concentrate and need to be given the opportunity to study well. Mobile phones are a disturbance, scientific research shows. We need to protect students against this," he said.

The ban has come through an agreement with the government's education department, schools and relevant organizations. Initially, it will be left up to schools to enforce it, with the prospect of legislation and binding rules next summer if this approach does not work.

The move follows similar steps taken recently in Finland, a country that is widely regarded as having one of the best education systems in the world. It is also the birthplace of Nokia, one of the most significant companies in the development of mobile phones.

"The government will reinforce the powers of teachers and principals to intervene in activities that disrupt teaching during school hours," said a Finnish government statement issued last month.

France has also had a ban in place since September 2018. Newspaper Le Figaro reported that before the ban, around 30 to 40 percent of all sanctions issued in senior schools related to the use of mobile phones in the classroom.
